As we move toward making birth control universally accessible in this country, I urge to not to allow religious exceptions for providers. This is simply not about religious freedom. No one has to take birth control if they don't believe in it. But a medical provider has no right to deny a woman a medication that Congress and the FDA have deemed legal. If a pharmacist feels they cannot morally dispense all legal medications, (S)he should find a new line of work. Are police personnel allowed to only enforce laws they happen to agree with? Of course not, and it should be no different for medical personnel. Thank you,
